A Step Removed: Third Party Neutrals as Process Coaches

Usual Facilitator Role:

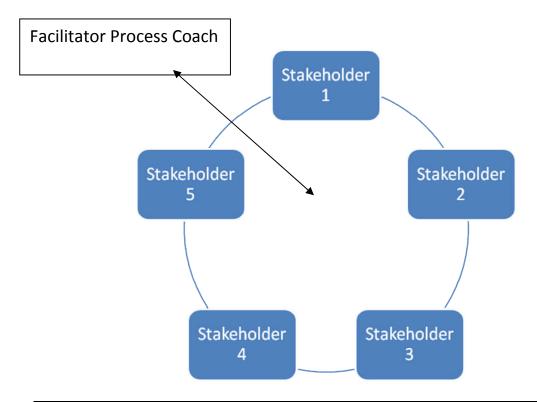

Facilitator directly facilitates group process.

Benefits	Challenges
Relationships and interests clear;	Less group capacity-building
transparency
Fewer personnel so perhaps less	Less enhancement of the field expensive
Real-time intervention	Can be awkward if the group has a strong chairperson

A Step Removed - Version 1

Facilitator does not facilitate. Instead, she or he offers process guidance to the full group as needed.

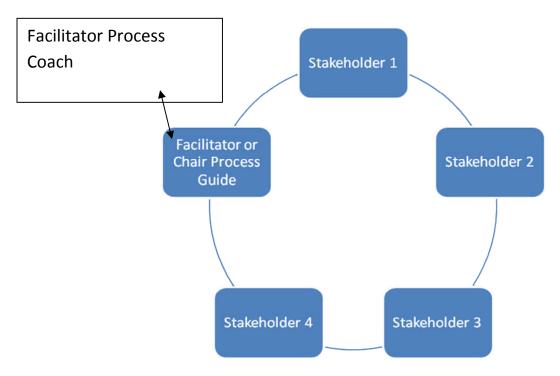

Benefits	Challenges
Group ownership	Early intervention less likely Gradual transition to self-run	Can be hard on facilitator ego and group	$ - requires strong integrity

Example Project: Colusa Subreach Advisory Workgroup Committees (C. Penny)

Sample Lesson Learned: It is helpful when every participant has a sense of connection to the facilitator.

A Step Removed - Version 2

Facilitator does not facilitate. Instead, she or he serves as a process coach to the group leader, chair, or facilitator.

Benefits	Challenges
Early intervention more likely	Shadow facilitator so less
	transparency
Enhance mentored facilitator	Cost capacity

Example Projects:

- a) Elkhorn Slough Early Mitigation Partnership(C. Penny)
- b) Carolina North Leadership Advisory Council (J. Stephens analyst)

Sample Lesson Learned: Conversations with the facilitator directly involved require significant dedication of time to describe the context to the coach – OR – Important to have coach observe meetings (in person, or via video).

A Step Removed - Version 3

Process coach/mentor co-facilitates with mentee.

Benefits	Challenges
Early intervention likely	Cost
Multiple resources to assist the	Can be complex dynamics for group	mentor and mentee
Mentee builds capacity	Group may build less of its own process capacity

Example Project: Zone 7 Water Agency (C. Penny)

Sample Lessons Learned

- a) There's a high degree of mutual learning opportunity among the facilitators.
- b) This approach requires significant discipline and judgment for the mentor to step back at the appropriate time.
